This 4 volume report presents the results of a three year evaluation of OEO's Special Impact Program.

2. Ackoff, Russell L. Redesigning the Future: A systems approach to societal problems. New York: John Wiley, 1974, 272p.

"Puts forth the thesis that society is going through a major cultural and technological revolution - a change from the Machine Age to the Systems Age. Develops a new way of looking at the world and applies systems thinking and technology to major societal problems."

3. Alford, Robert R. Health Care Politics, Ideological and Interest Group Barriers to Reform. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

' In Health Care Politics, Robert R. Alford argues that most health care "crises" are actually the creations of specific interest groups within the health care field who seek to make political capital out of ongoing situations. Using New York City as his case study, Alford examines its health care system in depth. His starting point is not the existence of a medical crisis in New York, but rather what he sees as a continuing, institutionalized failure of the health system to provide a decent standard of medical care for the residents of that city.

The author begins by evaluating the findings of major investigative commissions on New York hospitals from 1950 to 1970. He concludes that such commissions play an important political role NOT because they lead to significant policy innovations, but rather because they serve to convince the public that tangible action is being taken.

Alford also reports on programs to establish ambulatory health centers in New York, and he considers the role of the Health and Hospital Planning Council in coordinating various levels of bureaucracy. He points out that such efforts at coordination are largely fictitious because of the low priority they receive from the affected interest groups.

Alford presents a theoretical section defining the most important structure interests in the health field: 'corporate rationalizers,' 'professional monopolists,' and "equal-health advocates." The author discusses the relationships among these interests and the groups representing them and observes, for example, that the powers and privileges of doctors - the main element among the professional monopolists - are being challenged by the corporate rationalizers who seek to make hospitals the core providers of medical care, increasingly funded by the government.

Finally, Alford compares New York to other cities and health care with other policy areas. He concludes that neither the city nor the issue is unique but exhibits pervasive features of the policy making and political processes in the United States. For this reason, his work will be important to sociologists, political scientists, persons in government, and all those concerned personally and professionally with the operation of bureaucracies."

"This study considers social costs associated with the design, demonstration and implementation of the modular integrated utility system. In particular, it considers the social climate of communities, leadership patterns, conflicts and cleavages, specific developmental values, MIUS utility goal assessment and the suitability of certain alternative options for use in a program of implementation. Finally, it discusses some general considerations in the field of socio-technological planning. They include guidelines for understanding the conflict and diversity; some relevant goal choices and ideas useful to planners of the MIUS facility."

Still a Dream, The Changing Status of Blacks Since 1920.
Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1975, 381p.

"The authors probe the critical areas of change affecting the black experience: employment, education, marital and family patterns, health, housing, and power and control over individual destiny. From the massive data available, they try to ascertain which government programs succeeded and which failed.

Great progress has been made, the authors demonstrate, largely as a result of governmental efforts on many fronts. But they argue that the "benign neglect" and adverse economic conditions of the 1970's have offset some of the gains of the previous decade. Their conclusion is that a society where all men are created equal remains a dream, but that further progress can be made with a recommitment of the nation's energies to equality."

87. Trattner, Walter I. From Poor Law to Welfare State: A history of social welfare in America. New York: Free Press, 1974, 26p.

"Set against the background of developments in American history, especially social and intellectual trends, this book assimilates numerous earlier studies to provide a broad overview of American social welfare. It also traces the development of a variety of social welfare activities such as alms, charity, poor relief, philanthropy, and social reform.

From Poor Law to Welfare State is organized both chronologically and topically. Interspersed throughout are topical chapters such as Child Welfare, The Public Health Movement, The Mental Health Movement, and The Quest for Professionalism.

While intended primarily for historians and social workers who wish to obtain perspective on the magnitude and character of the problems with which they are dealing, From Poor Law to Welfare State will be of interest to all concerned with social justice and reform in America, including those involved both in social research and in direct action.
